MILLION DOLLAR MULTIPLIER

Welcome to the Million Dollar Multiplier!

In this special report, I want to share with you where most people fail at connecting with their prospects. I'm going to show you how to differentiate yourself in a competitive market regardless of what you do, and I'm also going to give you a very powerful tool that will help you reframe what you offer. I've had people use this exact tool and tell me that, literally, it changed their business overnight.

Let me put you in the environment to understand the context of this tool. Think of yourself as though you're at a cocktail reception or at some kind of networking reception with other business people. You're standing around, you've got a drink, and somebody walks up to you and asks you that classic, sometimes dreaded question: "So tell me .. what do you do?"

If you're like most people, you answer that question by framing it around what you do. For example, "I'm a financial planner," or "I own a clothing store," "I'm a life coach," "I'm a sign maker," "I sell widgets," or whatever business you're in. This is the way that most people answer this question and they never really think it through.

I'm going to give you a different way to look at this opportunity to explain "what you do".

If you want to start differentiating yourself in the marketplace, you have to start thinking differently and communicating what you do in a very different way. This goes back to very powerful marketing psychology, because here's the reality (and what I call the "cold, harsh truth") .. everyone out there in the world is already focused on their own problems and their own situation.

They've got enough things to think about without trying to figure out what you do or wondering how you can help them. Everything they hear goes through the "WII-FM" filter (What's In It For Me?)

Everything that they hear -- like when you said at the cocktail reception that you are a dog trainer -- goes through their brain and is processed through that filter. "What's in it for me? What does this mean to me?" And if they don't immediately connect with the way that you said it, they quickly filter you out. This is subconscious, and a habit that we all have in some form or another.

I don't want to hurt your feelings, but the reality is when you're talking to somebody and they don't really know anything about you, they don't care about what you're saying unless it's relevant to them.

Like everybody else, they're completely overwhelmed with all the messages that are coming at them, and the only way that they can hope to cope with all this messaging is to filter out the stuff that really doesn't matter.

You've got to communicate in a very powerful way that immediately gets their attention. Let me give you an example that will demonstrate this.

My wife and I have a place up in the mountains by our home in Calgary, so we go up there quite often. When we first bought the property, we actually bought it with a bunch of furniture that came with. The seller had imported all of this furniture from Mexico. One of the pieces was a cabinet that was perfect for holding a TV. The problem was, it apparently wasn't used for that in Mexico, because there were no holes in the back of the cabinet for the power or cable wires.

Since we were using it as a TV cabinet, this meant the cables were hanging out the front of the cabinet. It didn't really bother me, because I'm watching TV .. but my wife was unhappy about this. And as they say, "When Mama ain't happy .. ain't nobody happy."

Every time we went up, she asked me to fix this problem – in other words, to get a hole drilled in the back of this cabinet so that I could pass the cables through and hide them.

I went down to the local hardware store and ended up buying a power drill. I bought the drill, took it home, drilled a hole, and of course I was a hero because I fixed the problem, and solved the issue. I was able to pass the cable and a power outlet through the back of the cabinet and plug it in. My wife thought I was a genius. Or at least I did.

Here's the reality, even though I went and bought a power drill – did I really want to spend $100 on a power tool?

The answer, of course, is no. I wasn't really after the power drill. What I was really looking for was to walk into the "hole store", go down the aisle of 2-inch holes and take the 2-inch hole off the shelf, buy it, and drive home and slap that hole on the back of the cabinet.

Unfortunately there's no such thing .. you can't just buy the hole. In other words, the drill was a means to an end. The only way I could get the hole is if I bought the drill, and the drill was the vehicle for me to get what I wanted.

Whatever you provide in your business to clients, you need to recognize that the product or service you sell is only a means to the end of what your client really wants. In other words, people buy benefits, they don't buy features. You have to frame what you do around the perspective of what your customer or your prospect actually gets.

Another way to look at it is to focus on what you deliver, not what you do. Here's the question that you have to ask yourself, because this is what your prospect or your client is really looking for -- what is the measurable, external outcome that they get from doing business with you?

Now, again, let's look back to this mindset of when someone asks you what you do and you simply say, for example, "I'm a dog trainer." That allows that person to make all of the judgments and assumptions about what a dog trainer is. You're allowing them to make the decision about you in terms of whether or not it makes any sense for them, whether they're going to become more interested in what you say.

You sound like every other dog trainer in the universe, right? So the better solution is to figure out what you deliver – or, as I said before, what's the measurable, external outcome they get from doing business with you?

And to reframe being a dog trainer, imagine if you answer something like this:

"I allow people to eliminate their frustrations with their pet and allow them to enjoy the pride and love from having a well-behaved dog."

If you were to say that to someone, that's going to cause them to be curious and to lean into what you're saying – because you don't sound like every other dog trainer in the world. If they actually have a dog and they're in your market, you're speaking emotional things to them.

It's really all about appealing, identifying and connecting with the emotions that are driving people to make the decisions that they're making. If you notice where I've bolded the words in the above phrase, notice what I'm communicating. When you say, "I'm a dog trainer," there's no emotion at all. But using words like frustration, pride, love are emotionally-based .. and that's how you connect to your prospect.

Here's another example of this: one of my students, Ezra, is a musician. He writes custom songs for men who are trying to "get the girl", or win her back. He writes customized love songs.

This is the way that he used to describe what he did: "I write songs in the style of Billy Joel and Elton John." Well, on the surface that's not bad, but here's the problem – what if you don't like Billy Joel? What if you don't like Elton John?

Again, when you do this, you risk allowing the prospect to make their own assumptions and form their own perceptions around what you do. For Ezra, the last thing his clients really want to do is pay a bunch of money to have a song written.

The song is just a vehicle for what they're actually trying to achieve. Once he learned to use this powerful tool, here's what he came up with. Again, put yourself in the perspective of someone who is looking to try to get a song written for the end result. His positioning statement is now: "I write songs that make women fall in love again." Very, very powerful.

The challenge for you is to identify what are your prospects or your clients are really looking for. To do that, you need to convert what you do into benefits.

First of all, you need to focus on the outcome or the benefit that they receive by doing business with you. In other words, what is the outcome of giving you money, or at least the intended outcome?

Forget about the vehicle – make it about them instead of being about you or what you do. As you probably know, the thing that most people want to hear about most and what they like to talk about most is themselves –this is the subconscious way we're all wired.

The problem is that when you start out a sentence that says, "I am a dog trainer," you're talking about yourself. When you're talking to somebody else in this way, you're not addressing them – so you're talking about yourself and they start to tune out. If you can start talking about them and involving them in the conversation, that's when things get really powerful.

Here's another great trick to use when you respond to the question, "What do you do?" The first two words you should start with are, "I help." What that does is it forces you to talk about the other person.

Using The Million Dollar Multiplier

The Million Dollar Multiplier is a very simple tool, but it's tremendously powerful. I've literally had clients say that their business shifted overnight when they started using this.

If you look at the Multiplier on the page 7, you can see that there are 3 sentence you can complete to build a powerful positioning statement for your business.

On the 1st sentence, you are simply answering that question like you typically would if someone were to ask you, "What do you do?"

So if you're a massage therapist, you'd complete that sentence as "What I do is massage therapy" or "What I do is I'm a massage therapist."

Fill in the 1st blank however you would normally answer that question.

For part 2, your job is to complete the sentence, "What this means to you is...". By framing it this way, it focuses you on speaking about your prospect or your client. Instead of focusing on what you do, the focus suddenly becomes about them, and what you deliver to them.

Complete that sentence as though you were speaking directly to your prospect or client, and you were trying to explain what benefits they get from doing business with you. Again, it can help you to remain focused on them if you start your answer with "I help..". Try it – this is a very powerful tip.

And now, the 3rd sentence really adds power to this process. In the 3rd step, you complete the sentence, "What this really means to you is..."

We're actually tricking our brain here, because we're still programmed to think from our own perspective –because that's what we do as human beings. The second sentence starts talking about benefits, but then the third piece forces you to push through the benefit and really uncover the underlying benefit that ultimately the client or prospect is really looking for. It allows you to connect on a much deeper level with your prospect.

Let me give you an example of this tool in action.

Let's assume that I am an insurance salesperson, because that's a challenging one. If you're at a cocktail reception or a chamber of commerce meeting and you walk up to someone and say, "What do you do?" And they say, "I sell insurance" .. well most of the time, that's all you need to know, right?

I don't have anything against insurance salespeople, it's just that most people have experienced overbearing insurance salesmen trying to sell insurance at cocktail parties. Here's what an insurance salesperson could use this tool for, and this will give you an example of how powerful this is.

Step one is answering, "What I do is...". Well, what I do is I "sell insurance". Pretty straight forward.

Step two is "What this means to you is...". Now I have to think about it from the perspective of the prospect. If I were speaking to a prospect right now and I had to fill the sentence in, I might say something like, "What this means to you is I help you identify the risks in your life that you need to protect against."

Well that's definitely more interesting, and you can see that this is more engaging for the person who is listening to it. You can see that I started with, "I help" because that immediately forces me to start focusing on who I'm talking to (my prospect) as opposed to myself.

Let's move on to the 3rd sentence and complete it – "What this really means to you is...". Let's say we complete it by saying, "I help ensure a happy and fulfilling future for you and those you love by protecting what matters to you most."

You can see that's a lot more powerful, because what that is going to do is cause the person to whom you're speaking to instantly become more curious about what it is you do. They're going to say to themselves, "I wonder how they do that."

What that causes is a dialogue – it causes a conversation because now they're curious about how you actually do this. It's going to open them up to the conversation as opposed to, "I sell insurance" which is going to close down that conversation for most people .. because all of their preconceived notions about insurance salespeople starts to kick in.

Again, you can see in this 3rd step that I'm using emotional words -- happy, fulfilling, love, protecting. Those are things that get at the emotional need that most people have.

In summary, the bottom line is this: people subconsciously filter out most of the messages that are happening in the world. We don't have any choice, because there are thousands of messages that we're exposed to every day.

You have to recognize this, and to get attention you have to frame what you do around the results you deliver. In other words, your prospect or your client only cares about what you do as it relates to their situation.

Whenever you're thinking about explaining what you do or describing what service or product or program you offer, always focus on the outcome or the benefit that you deliver, and always try to start with the two words "I help." If you do that, you'll go a long way to cutting through the clutter and differentiating yourself with prospects and clients.

And now .. it's your turn! On the next page is the Million Dollar Multiplier that you can print out and use to create a powerful positioning statement for your business.

I hope this tool proves to be as powerful for you as it has for hundreds of my students around the world.

To Your Success,

"It's What You Deliver, Not What You Do"

This exercise guides you into describing or positioning what you do from the perspective of the outcome or benefit your client gets, as opposed to leaving it as a description of the product or service. By focusing on what the result is that you create for your client, you frame your offering in a way that is more compelling and relevant to them.

Part 1:

What I/we do is ...
